He liked to collect all kinds of objects. He rummaged through his parents' drawers, kept the strangest knick-knacks his grandmother Rosa gave him, and never missed a second-hand market.

He had a wonderful mind where characters and imaginary worlds swirled like waves.

"Look, Depo, I'm a feline like you. Take me to the planet Amordegato. I want to meow at the moon before I go to bed!" he would say, with a striped stocking hanging from the waist of his pyjamas like a tail.

When the medieval market came to town, she would put on her most colourful dress, her golden crocheted crown and, of course, she would not forget her wooden bow.

How she enjoyed strolling past the street stalls and watching the musicians with their drums and flutes, the puppet theatre and the goose parade!

At bath time, she could become a diver on a rescue mission. She would put on her swimming goggles, a straw in her mouth, and dive into the bathtub among dolphins, sharks, and plastic boats. "Narvalete needs help, a hungry shark wants to catch him!"

The day Martin lost his little purple pony in the sandpit at the park, Ana appeared with her Sherlock Holmes hat and detective's briefcase. She had everything she needed: a magnifying glass, powder to detect fingerprints, a torch, a notebook for taking notes, latex gloves, tweezers and sample bags.

In no time at all, she located the missing pony. She was an excellent investigator!

"Natalia is coming over to play this afternoon. We'll be stealthy ninjas training to travel through time and find a magical place to live," she explained to her mother as she prepared her aviator glasses, her toy katana and the dressing gown she was going to use as a kimono.
